MAINTSTONE'S HOUSEKEEPER, a new novel just published by Lorimer, seems destined to have a run. The author, Eliza Moxley, was called by Douglas Jerrold "Silverpen," and her style has the point, brightness, and vivacity which distinguish the best of her work. Though, in some respects, improbable, is managed with skill, keeps a surprise constantly ahead, and satisfies the pleasant tension of the reader from beginning to end. Many of the characters are new, and as good as they are new. The contrast between the author's style and that of Mrs. Gaskell's Housekeeper, with Miss Jane, the clever and tyrant of Maintstone's kitchen, and numerous vivacious scenes, which will cap the experiences of many other housekeepers besides Maintstone's. There is a certain piquancy, frankness, and wit in the book, which will make it a favorite with many readers. The author's name is well known, and her story is likely to be a success.

So The Boston Transcript says, "She has got her New York Bookers."

LONDON, Publisher, No. 319 Washington-st., Boston.
